Communicators Types

Introduction:

We are all unique in some ways when it comes to different qualities. Every individual has his or her way of expressing themselves. Not just in the context of looks, habits, and mind power, but we are all unique in our way of communication. Some people love to talk more and others less. Some talk aggressively and others in fine-tunes, i.e., extroverts and some introverts. In this way, everyone has his way of communicating with others, so the communicators have been categorized into different groups and classes.

Definition

Communication is the exchange of any kind of information through speaking, signs, or behaviors between individuals. Communication is essential to living as life without communication is almost impossible.

Details

There are basically four types of communicators which are used to describe most people. Those are mentioned below:

1: Analytical Communicators:

Analytical communicators are very direct in their communication. They depend on factual reasons for an explanation. Their thinking is free from any kind of emotional stress. Their language is specific, and inspirational things never rationalize their judgment. They have a very linear and one-way approach to interacting with other individuals.

Example:

A person who includes only facts and figures in his communication and sticks to the point of factual information is analytical in his communication approach.

2: Intuitive Communicators:

The approach of intuitive communicators is entirely different from analytical communicators. They see the big picture and be happy with the obvious data and unnecessary details. They are like dreamers who like to think about the future and make big plans. Not very good at following procedures or instructions, accurate coordinators only need common sense to see things unfold behind their minds. They have very strict rules, and one needs to play according to rules.

Example:

Some people might tell you things in steps like steps A, B, and following. But, this whole process is a hectic one. So, Intuitive communicators choose the easy path and move directly to the final step, Z.

3: Functional Communicators:

Functional communicators are more technical in their approach. They are systematic, and they believe in a more structured process. They execute in a step-by-step approach, lead with a proper strategy and never make quick decisions. There are fewer mishaps as everything is organized in their system. There have been appropriate practices and exercises in decision making which reduce the cause of any error by a huge margin.

Example:

Functional communicators use the step-by-step approach in their doings. They are totally the opposite of intuitive communicators. Their work is based on a proper strategy and flow, and they never miss any step of what is happening. Like, problem-solving techniques in different strategies.

4: Personal Communicators:

Personal communicators are mostly emotional in their dealings. They speak to ambassadors. They value the thoughts and feelings of others. They put relationships first. Building relationships at a personal level is important to them. Approachable, great listeners and mentors. They see a change in people's attitudes. Being a mediator in conflict resolution is their power. They make informed decisions to analyze different perspectives. They use triggers of emotions and are excellent listeners.

Personal communication includes chats, email, text messages, online chats or direct messages, private chats, phone chats, live chats, unrecorded courses, memos, letters, and notes from archived chat groups or bulletin boards online.
